More News Manson's final words before his death were "Do what thou wilt shall be the whole of the law," as he sought to clarify to his followers that the fantasy of free will was merely a fantasy. The doctrine is also attributed to Aleister Crowley. Manson's first followers, known as the Manson Family, were formed in the mid-1960s after he invited young people to his compound in California. With their cult-like discipline, Manson's disciples would view acts such as rape as natural acts and even boasted about doing such things in their shared writings. While trying to clarify his thoughts on the way the system works to the public in an interview with MTV in the late 1970s,
