Acromegalic cardiomyopathy is a well recognized condition, yet the pathophysiology of this association remains poorly understood. The observation of an enlargement of the heart in subjects with GH excess, the effects of serum GH levels on cardiac haemodynamics, and the striking cardiac response to somatostatin analogues, which reduce the GH levels, in acromegalic patients have led to the theory that the heart is enlarged by direct action of GH on the heart. We have encountered a condition where cardiac enlargement occurs before the development of significant hypertension and without an obvious increase in the serum GH level. We therefore set out to study the clinical, biochemical and haemodynamic data of patients with acromegalic cardiomyopathy, and to compare them with those of patients with acromegaly and hypertensive heart disease. All patients were investigated for evidence of the co-existence of hypertension and cardiac disease, and for the presence of acromegaly. Only those patients in whom the diagnosis of hypertension and cardiac disease was confirmed were selected for analysis. A control group of hypertensive patients was also recruited. Cardiovascular measurements were performed by Doppler echocardiography and catheterisation. The GH concentration was measured by IRMA and the cardiac output by the Fick method. The hypertensive patients with acromegalic cardiomy
