The approach to the patient with unstable angina pectoris continues to evolve and to be influenced by a range of factors, including the high incidence of coronary artery disease in the general population, the increased use of acute coronary angiography for evaluation of the unstable patient, and the emphasis on aggressive medical therapies. Despite these influences, it is clear that medical therapy has an important role in the treatment of these patients, although it is uncertain whether such management is better than bypass surgery alone. There is now very good evidence for the effectiveness of beta-adrenergic receptor blocking agents in reducing anginal pain and changing the electrocardiogram in patients with unstable angina. Studies of antiplatelet and antithrombotic therapy suggest that there are not immediate clinical benefits for heparin, but the benefit may become apparent in the long term. The evidence for vasodilator therapy is not yet compelling. In the setting of acute myocardial infarction, it is now widely accepted that beta-adrenergic receptor blocking agents should be continued for up to 6 weeks after infarction. In the setting of non-Q wave infarction, the evidence does not establish a role for beta-adrenergic receptor blocking agents. The role of glycoprotein IIb/IIIa inhibitors is limited to patients with acute coronary syndromes and to those who are not good candidates for thrombolysis. Ultimately, it is likely that therapy for unstable angina will include medical, surgical, and interventional strategies, and that physicians will use a personal blend of these strategies, based on the limitations of each therapy. The police force in the small northern German town of Rheine said Wednesday it will initiate a review of potential anti-Semitism when the town council votes to recognize the city as having "tolerance for discrimination" on Friday. "When I was 19 years old, I joined the Austrian Nazi party and for many years I was active in the 'Bund der Einsatzkommandanten' [BdE], an organization whose aim is that of youth organizations for Nazi veterans that were set up after 1945," Jan Pinkert, one of the two council members 570a42141b
