Q: Canonical and duplicate questions, what do we do with them? In the last few days there has been a flurry of questions, some duplicates of existing questions and some not. What do we do with them?

A: One of the basic (but not only) guidelines for handling questions is "preferably, only handle duplicates of existing questions". Sometimes, one of the other options may be preferred, but those situations should be handled as exceptions. In general, duplicates are encouraged because they save effort on the part of the asker, moderators, and even answerers. Since the question is the same, there is no real benefit to having two places for the same answer. I try not to remove too many duplicates, but if the duplicates really do take up space (even in the form of votes, which can take up space) and if the new question is really low quality and not likely to be improved, then I would remove it. One of the major problems that I see with too many duplicates is that they create a strong bias against the site. We should never be in the business of telling people to go somewhere else.
