These results are similar to those of a previous study showing a shorter operative time, less intraoperative blood loss, and less pain in the transabdominal group \[@B24]]. However, our study showed no significant differences in intraoperative blood loss, operative time, hospital stay, or postoperative pain between the two groups. Most of the previous studies included only patients who underwent a hysterectomy and did not limit the indication to those undergoing a myomectomy. This study included patients who underwent myomectomy and patients who underwent hysterectomy. In this study, we found that the transabdominal approach was an effective and safe alternative to the transvaginal approach, with less intraoperative blood loss, less operation time, and higher proportion of single-port laparoscopic surgery in both groups. There was no significant difference in the surgical duration or hospital stay between the two groups in the hysterectomy subgroup. Other studies comparing these two surgical approaches used a similar grouping as ours \[@B23], \[@B24]]. The number of ports in our study was 6, with four ports in the middle and upper abdominal region. The total operative time was significantly shorter in the transabdominal group than in the transvaginal group. The mean operating time was 51 ± 21 minutes in the transabdominal group and 84 ± 23 minutes in d0c515b9f4
