Ovarian cancer (OC) is the most common cause of cancer-related death in women. LncRNAs, a class of noncoding RNAs longer than 200 nucleotides, have been indicated to participate in the regulation of tumor initiation and progression. As a newly discovered, functional lncRNA, LINC02376 promotes bladder cancer progression, but its role in OC has not yet been elucidated. In this study, the expression and role of LINC02376 in OC were assessed. In vitro studies were performed to assess the proliferation, migration, and invasion of OC cells by knocking down and overexpressing LINC02376. The underlying molecular mechanisms were explored. Finally, in vivo studies were carried out to determine the effect of LINC02376 on the tumorigenesis of OC. LINC02376 was markedly upregulated in OC cells and tissues and correlated with tumor progression. Overexpression of LINC02376 significantly promoted the proliferation and migration of OC cells, whereas knockdown of LINC02376 inhibited tumorigenesis of OC cells. Furthermore, LINC02376 sponged miR-1301 and positively regulated its expression. MIR-1301 knockdown abolished the promoting effects of LINC02376
