Verjin zangi Nvirvac BanastExcutyunner Vagal stimulation prevents the increase in right atrial pressure associated with cholecystokinin. Although rats exhibit their characteristic response to intravenous cholecystokinin-8 (CCK-8) infusion after vagal blockade, they fail to exhibit a hypotensive response. In conscious rabbits CCK-8 (2 or 4 micrograms/kg) failed to alter the mean arterial pressure (MAP) or heart rate (HR) in vagally blocked (atropine sulfate) or sham animals. In contrast, in vagal-intact animals CCK-8 increased MAP from 100 +/- 2 to 101 +/- 2 mm Hg (4 micrograms/kg; P less than .01) and reduced HR from 289 +/- 9 to 214 +/- 12 beats/min (P less than .01). The increase in right atrial pressure (RAP) that followed CCK-8 infusion was less in vagal-intact animals (4.2 +/- 0.2 mm Hg) than in sham animals (8.0 +/- 0.8 mm Hg; P less than .01). These results suggest that vagal tone participates in the reflex hypotensive response to the administration of CCK-8. Studies of human alveolar macrophages by video-enhanced contrast microscopy. Video-enhanced contrast microscopy (VECM) improves the visualization of fine structures in cells and tissues. We have adapted the VECM method to study pulmonary alveolar macrophages (PAM) at a particular level of granularity. PAM were freshly isolated from human bronchoalveolar lavage. Cell culture was maintained in the presence of interferon gamma. The surface activity of human PAM was examined with respect to their ability to undergo phagocytosis and release of oxygen-derived free radicals. The respiratory burst of PAM was also evaluated through production of superoxide anion and nitric oxide by flow cytometry and fluorescence microscopy. VECM was performed as described by Nakashima et al. (Nakashima A, Fujita K, Sato R, Nagabayashi N. Jpn J Exp Biol 53(4):513-521, 2011). The system consists of a video camera (optiscan SP,

A: The error you are getting is because the innerHTML property of the element is a function, and you are trying to assign it an object. To fix, do one of the following: // TypeError: Cannot set property 'innerHTML' of null document.getElementById('verjinzang').innerHTML = str; // TypeError: Cannot read property 'innerHTML' of null document.getElementById('verjinzang').innerHTML = str; Or convert the str to a string: document.getElementById('verjinzang').innerHTML = str.toString(); You should also really do: document.getElementById('verjinzang').innerHTML = str + ';'; Not just this will make your code cleaner and more maintainable, but it also makes the code better at keeping the separation between the "content" and "the markup" that HTML is made of. A year ago, when the black Jaguar XJ was being marketed, Jaguar indicated that it was interested in selling the car in the United States," Greg Kable, director of sales for Jaguar, said at the time. "We found that there was a real demand for it and that a lot of people in the U.S. want a Jaguar." "Jaguar has become a huge success in the United States because Americans have great taste and they want something special — not a generic, mass-produced vehicle," he said. Not anymore. Another all-new XJ convertible is about to be added to the company's offerings. The new XJ, a successor to the XK, comes with an eye-popping price: $106,000. The XJ convertible that will join the XF and XK models in the 2014 model year lineup has not been officially named. But the XJ name comes with a lot of baggage, and the first time the new XJ is shown publicly will be at the Frankfurt Motor Show in September. The magazine Road & Track reports that the new convertible will replace the XK and it will cost as much as $102,000. Although it is small, the XJ is the most expensive car in Jaguar's lineup. The X
