Busted in Tanzania They first began scouring the giant boulders for minerals and water, but the search turned up more than they bargained for. The crew members of a mining venture in north-eastern Tanzania uncovered an ancient stone that both alarmed and excited archaeologists. Unlike other megalithic structures, this one doesn't appear to have been a burial ground. Still, ancient builders are thought to have used stones to create their burial mounds more than 3,500 years ago. Now two years after being uncovered, the towering boulders have been transformed into a stone sculpture of three and a half metres high and three metres in diameter that looks more like a medieval castle than a burial mound. Steven Holochwaite, of London's Institute of Archaeology, who is supervising the restoration of the 3,500 year old monument, called Kingumiria, says it's completely impossible to tell what type of building it might have been. But the fact it has a roofed entranceway suggests it could have been either an ancient market place or a religious site. "There are many religious sites on the Indian sub-continent that have very strongly roofed entrances," said Mr Holochwaite. "You'd definitely get a feeling for this being a holy area." Archeologists suspect it may be the site of a royal burial ground or even a place where early city dwellers worshipped. Mines in Tanzania aren't exactly on top of the world Mr Holochwaite added that many African communities used stone structures to help mark the passage of time. And similar sites have been uncovered nearby in the region, suggesting that they were erected to mark important dates and perhaps even to mark geographical locations. But here on the banks of the Tana river, a more practical purpose for its construction seems to have come into play. Read more: Read more:

What's new in Fifa 22:

- World-Class Players. Big-name players like Neymar and Lionel Messi made big headlines when they signed with Barcelona and Real Madrid earlier this year, but EA has spent the past two years developing FIFA's roster to include stars more representative of the entire world. Every player on the FIFA roster contains data showing what position they play, their attributes, style of play, and more.
- Smart Pass. Is your friend dribbling up the field? Does your rival always manage to deliver a killer cross over the top? Select players within a passing zone to send them through killer pass tactics, send a precise pass, or collect a perfectly timed pass to send your teammates into the perfect position. These assists will take you to new heights.
- Over Pass. Every time you pick up the ball and pass, your team will have a chance to win the ball back. If you pass to the right, defenders are forced to mark the ball with their entire body - reducing the chance that an opponent will steal your prize possession.
- Headers. Let the team you lead have the ball! Win it back by scoring or intercepting a cross from the field or a corner kick.

- Skill Shots. Do you want to hit a volley or a chip? Choose from a wide or close-range shot to rack up accuracy bonuses and rack up the Fear Factor. Every successful shot earns you points and more skill shots will earn more points, guaranteeing success with this deadly shot.
- Open Play. Drop back and play a wide, narrow or central position. Attack or defend - the choice is yours.

Q: Unable to broadcast messages from one instance of a service I have created a service named Service that is capable of sending broadcast messages from its onCreate() method to all of the currently registered receivers in its service declaration:

Intent filter = new Intent("myApp.MyService.myBroadcast"); filter.addCategory("MY_CATEGORY"); this.registerReceiver(broadcastReceiver, filter);

However, when I try to create another Service (named MyService2) which receives the same broadcast, I get no broadcast messages and am forced to use service to send a new one, like so:

Intent filter2 = new Intent("myApp.MyService2.myBroadcast"); filter2.addCategory("MY_CATEGORY"); this.registerReceiver(broadcastReceiver, filter2);

My question is, why can't I get broadcast messages from a second instance of the same Service that I am trying to attach a receiver to? Also, I have tried simply changing the instance of the Service's receiver, and it still does not work. If there is a better way to accomplish this broadcast messaging, that would work as well.

A: The problem was actually that I had a newline character in my intent's action parameter. Apparently Android is not very tolerant of having a newline in that field, and made the service think that I was registering two separate actions. Q: JSON.NET Value Conversion gives NullReferenceException I have a class Article (for simplicity only ever one of those, no specialized hierarchies) that I serialize to JSON as it's a singleton (I'm using Unity):

public class Article : MonoBehaviour { public string text; } [SerializeField] public Article article; I deserialize it back: [SerializeField] private Dictionary
